'Although we may not be metaphysically responsible for ourselves, we are still morally responsible for ourselves.' Discuss.

In what sense, if any, does voluntary action require the existence of acceptable alternatives?

Is letting die ever as bad as killing? If so, so what?

Is there a defensible formulation of the Doctrine of Double Effect?

Are there any universal moral principles?

Is ethical partiality an incoherent notion?

Is it always irrational to act contrary to reason?

Either (a) In what sense, if any, can reason give rise to a motive?

Or (b) What, if anything, is artificial about an artificial virtue?

'The claim that moral claims can only be made relative to a given society is either trivially true or obviously false.' Discuss.

Either (a) Is there a defensible form of non-voluntary euthanasia?

Or (b) Is there a right to die?
